Strategy Description

Ascend Asia Alternative Income Fund 'AAI' seeks stable and recurring income that is independent of market performance by investing opportunistically in truly alternative investments, instead of traditional income assets such as equities and bonds. Commentary

AAI delivered another gain of 0.80% in September. The performance looks very much as if someone drew a straight line from the recent performance trend. Since inception, AAI has compounded at 8.7%. Crucially, it has done so without the volatility of traditional high-income strategies with exposures to high yield bonds and equities.

In previous years, there would be an air of tension this time of the year as we went into hurricane season and investors worried about catastrophes leading to losses. At this point, the song “Wake me up when September ends” is apt. Why September? Because that tends to be when the worst happens. Perhaps that is why the song resonated with many in the aftermath of Hurricane Katrina in years past.

So AAI has made it past the worst of hurricane season and emerged stronger. But it is too early to flash the all-clear signal. Storms are expected to develop in October but they are currently not expected to pose meaningful threat. More importantly, we continue to enrich the portfolio with uncorrelated sources of return.

We previously discussed how royalty investments let you share in steady streams of income from things that others pay for without having to run a business yourself. We have used music as examples, but our royalty investments are not just confined to music. They also include pharmaceutical assets which are resilient to economic slowdown.

Because royalties are tied to ongoing sales or usage, they can keep generating cash flow even when markets are volatile. Over time, reinvesting these predictable payments can help you grow and diversify your wealth, much like collecting rent from multiple tenants but in different industries.
